“Fail until you don’t: fight, grind, repeat.”

-Bobby Bones

Growing up, Nancy Hill always knew that she wanted to have a career making a difference in other people’s lives. Her father, an Episcopal priest, would often take her and her sisters on mission trips to other countries to show the importance of helping others. On those trips, she learned that many people are dealing with difficult circumstances and experience inequality. These lessons drove her to pursue a career that involves helping others.

Her teenage and early adulthood years were hard. She moved out on her own at the age of 17 and became pregnant a year later. She obtained her certified nurse’s assistant license and worked in hospice for several years. After the birth of her second child, she had the desire to go to college. She started earning a degree in psychology, aspiring to become a licensed chemical dependency counselor. After she graduates from San Antonio College, her goal is to earn a master’s degree in counseling to help those in the community who struggle with substance use.
